I've learnt English for 5 years and I found that in order to be good at a foreign language you should definitely have a good method for studying and practicing.

For me, the best way to improve pronunciation skills is through imitation and practice. We should listen to or watch an array of materials in English such as songs, podcasts, TV programs, films... because no teachers are better than native speakers. We can study their mouth by observing how they move their tongues and lips while speaking. Then we can try to imitate them and check whether we are making correct sounds in front of a mirror or through a recording device. It also seems to me that taking tests regularly is the most effective way to master my English grammar. Practicing indeed makes me understand more about that grammar point and retain that knowledge better. Additionally, I always have some good reference books nearby to consult when necessary.

In brief, learning a foreign language is a long journey requiring a lot of time and effort. The most important thing is that you must find an effective way to study that best suits you and practice as much as possible.
